Northern Businessman Condemns Forces Behind Social Revolution

Dear Editor:

After reading Professor James Silver's book of social anarchy I want you to know that all people in the North are not out to start or would ever want a social revolution in the South.

I, along with many of my friends feel that social customs of one area should not be inflicted on people of another area.

Incidentally, the relatively few Northerners who join these freedom marches are beatniks and themselves are social misfits and adventure seekers.

Funny thing, I am a businessman and I will always be a Republican, as I like a federal government with a minimum amount of federal intervention and control on people. And of course, the Democratic Party has traditionally been for federal controls in just about everything. However, from what I have read and heard, my sentiments are with the Democrats in the South and not the Republicans.

I never heard of your paper before I read Silver's book; and the mere fact that he knocked it makes me want to take it. I would like to be a subscriber to The Clarion - Ledger.

I could never like a person who robs or slaps the hand that feeds him. I am afraid that whenever Silver might live he would want to start a social reform movement to suit his personal wishes.
